THE DEATH OF THE U.S.S. WASP

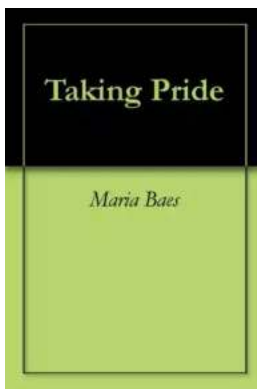

September 15, 1942

Eric Hammel

At dawn on September 15, 1942, the United States Navy had four fleet aircraft carriers to its name, but two, the Enterprise and the Saratoga, had been damaged in action and were undergoing repairs. The other two, the Hornet and the Wasp, were sailing in submarine-infested waters off the Eastern Solomon Islands, supporting the U.S. Navy's first attempt to land a large number of U.S. Marine reinforcements at Guadalcanal's beleaguered Lunga Perimeter.

At noon on September 15, when the American troop convoy was sighted by a Japanese land-based patrol bomber, it turned away in fear of a carrier-based attack. At that moment, Task Force 61—the carriers Wasp and Hornet and a surface force that included the battleships North Carolina and Washington—was about one hundred miles from the transports, just below the 12th Parallel, about 250 miles southeast of Guadalcanal's Marine-held Henderson Field.
